Founders' Commentary

Standard Media Index (SMI) is flying on a higher growth plane

SMI's revenue growth rate in first nine months of 2021 has been more than 50% and the company is expecting to increase that growth rate by the end of the year. Notwithstanding investment in new products, new sales teams in new geographies and the integration of a great deal of new data, SMI continues to be cash profitable.

SMI is the best type of data business in that has access to a unique data stream which is highly valuable to its customers. SMI was founded by two women – Sue Fennessy and Jane Ractliffe – in Sydney but is now a global company with management split between New York, London and Sydney.

The unique data source SMI has access to is the real time stream of advertising dollar spend across all types of media broken down by ad type and advertising sub-category in every significant advertising market in the world. SMI has access to this data through exclusive contracts with all of the world's largest media buying agencies.

SMI's customers are major media companies, financial services providers, major advertisers, major global consulting and market intelligence firms and other data companies. Customers pay an annual, usually multi-year, subscription to access SMI data.

As we have learned on the journey with the SMI team it takes time and perseverance to access data, harmonise massive data sets, build products and make large enterprise sales. After many years of steady growth and growing cash profitability, the 2021 calendar year has seen the company shift onto a new higher growth plane. As is often the case with companies in the portfolio, accelerated growth at SMI has come from new product development and taking current products to new markets.

In calendar year 2021 SMI has established new sales teams in Canada and the UK. This expansion into new markets has been partially facilitated by Group M, one of the largest global media buying agencies committing all its data to the SMI pool. Group M has particularly high market share in the UK, China and other Asian markets which makes its data key to ensuring sufficient market coverage. SMI now has virtually unlimited opportunity to add new countries to the SMI data pool and, in time, to make sales in those markets.

Product development in the last year has focused on the fast growth digital advertising markets. The new products SMI has developed compare advertising spend and pricing across digital and broadcast video media, video ad format and digital platform. No other data provider has access to anything like the breadth and depth of advertising spend data that SMI can call on in developing these ad spend and pricing products.

The third growth opportunity SMI is pursuing, after new geographies and new products, is accessing new customer segments, in particular major brand advertisers. Brand advertisers are searching for data that helps them plan their advertising spend effectively and data that helps them understand how effective their advertising spend is in driving sales, brand awareness and propensity to buy. This is particularly challenging for brands in the myriad of new digital video advertising markets. SMI's new products, combined with brand advertisers own data on sales and brand attributes, addresses these issues more effectively than any other data provider.

In a very busy last nine months for the fund, it has been easy to overlook the quiet performers in the portfolio. SMI is a prime example of this and emphasises the underlying strength of the portfolio, which is looking in great shape as we head towards the end of the calendar year.
